AMERICA is in the midst of an unprecedented opioid crisis. It is the deadliest drug crisis in American history and as of August it had already claimed more lives than the wars in Vietnam, Iraq, Afghanistan and World War I combined. That is more than 60,000 dead—many of them young people. The death toll has also spurred new worries about more than 800,000 addicts. That is more than were registered as heroin addicts at the height of the crack epidemic in the 1980s. Although more than half of Americans live in counties with a problem, opioid abuse is more concentrated in the hardest hit states of the south and west, such as West Virginia, Ohio, and Kentucky. And it is fuelling a new wave of workplace accidents. In his inaugural address in 2017, Donald Trump warned that this was “the opioid epidemic”. And in the months that followed, the president followed up on the pledge by declaring a public health emergency, banning opioid pills and limiting access to new ones, and declaring a national “action plan”. The plan has not delivered the expected results. But it did prompt a change in the attitude of the federal government towards the drugs. The head of the agency responsible for the new approach to opioids is Kevin Counihan, a pharmacologist at Harvard 2d92ce491b
