The structural and electronic properties of C(60) are analysed with all-electron self-consistent density functional theory (DFT) in a tight binding (TB) model. The good agreement obtained with experiment indicates that this model provides a reliable approach to the study of the properties of C(60) fullerenes. We show that there is a strong electronic delocalization between the boron cores and the carbon rings of the fullerene; the strong electron correlation with the boron cores is reflected in an almost unscreened, but very strong, Coulomb interaction. For the inter-ring electronic density, the electron-repulsion term of the Coulomb interaction is screened by the aromatic carbon rings with decreasing screening strength as the distance from the boron cores increases. For the intra-ring electron density, the screening is weak. These results help to explain the discrepancy between experiment and previous tight binding calculations.
