This invention relates to radial flow, cross-flow trays in general, and, in particular, to an improved tray which is especially useful for cooling the end portions of semiconductor wafers during manufacturing or testing. Generally, during manufacturing of integrated circuit (IC) semiconductor devices, semiconductor wafers are subjected to various heat treating steps. In order to enhance the mechanical and electrical characteristics of these wafers, or to promote the adhesion of photolithographic layers, it is necessary to maintain these wafers within narrow temperature ranges. The devices being made, however, are far larger and more complex than the size of the wafers. Thus, a very different temperature gradient exists across a wafer than that across the supporting surface of a processing machine. As a result, a temperature differential exists between the central portion of the wafer and the outer portion thereof which may be up to about a 25 degree Celsius difference. For the purposes of achieving acceptable heat treating conditions across the surface of a large, typically 6 inch, wafer, it is known to employ a cross-flow bath tray device adapted to support the wafer during heat treating thereof. Generally, a tray device for supporting a semiconductor wafer comprises a base and a thin sheet or plate of material, which is usually stainless steel, hinged to the upper edge of the base. This sheet is usually made flat prior to use by closely spaced, parallel, and elongated shallow slots extending from top to bottom of the sheet. It will be appreciated that for use, the plate is folded and flattened so that the slots in the sheet are disposed generally in a cross-flow fashion. As a result, any cooling fluid used to cool the outer portions of the wafer will have access to the central portion thereof. In the past, one of the problems in the design of tray devices of this type has been the provision of means for separately supporting the back side of the wafer during heat treating. The back side of the w
