Turkey to open first US-backed base in Syria under new military operation January 20, 2019 by Joseph Fitsanakis After the Turkish military began conducting airstrikes against the northern Syrian town of Afrin earlier this month, Turkish Deputy Prime Minister Bekir Bozdag declared that Turkey's new military operation in Syria would be a "ground, air, and sea operation." He was referring to the Turkish "Olive Branch" military operation that Turkish warplanes commenced targeting the Syrian enclave of Afrin around midnight on 9 January. As of Wednesday, Turkish jets continued to bomb targets in northern Syria as sporadic artillery and mortar fire was launched by Turkish artillery units stationed near the border. In response, the Turkish Air Force struck more targets in Syria. Tensions escalated further on Wednesday, when the Turkish government announced that Turkey will open a "newly established" US-backed military base in Syria. A diplomatic statement issued by the Foreign Ministry in Ankara on Wednesday night said that the new base would be "built on the border between Turkey and [the] Democratic Federation of Northern Syria [the People's Protection Units/YPG]". While this announcement did not specify the location of the new US-backed base, foreign sources in Ankara report that the base is likely to be established in the city of Manbij, located along the Turkish-Syrian border. The move was broadly welcomed by Turkey's pro-government media, who see it as an attempt to put pressure on Washington and the Kurds in Syria. However, the Kurds, who are allied with the United States and Turkey, are not pleased by the announcement. The YPG claimed that the US-led coalition in Syria had no formal agreements with Turkey regarding the creation of the new military base. Meanwhile, another source of consternation for the YPG was the reported deployment of US Special Forces in the area. The new base was reportedly established to benefit the US operations in Syria. However, the YPG is wary of possible US plans to use the base
