Archives: tax without representation A recent U.S. Supreme Court decision in Caperton v. Massey, an oil company's lawsuit against members of a West Virginia legislature, is further exemplifying the dangers inherent to corporate rights and the law of the jungle. The most important lesson to take from this decision, however, is not the implications for the protection of individual and corporate rights; rather, it is the blatant manipulation of the U.S. Supreme Court by corporate-funded attorneys in an effort to suppress democracy itself, through misuse of the law. It is well established that the U.S. Supreme Court, including the current 9-member conservative majority, is made up of attorneys who are often quite politically aligned. Indeed, the Court has been created and is populated by lawyers who move from one political party to another, shifting their allegiances as the political tide or an incumbent administration changes. This is in stark contrast to the evolution of the Supreme Court in the past, when the justices balanced their duties with their attitudes and personal politics. The Court's voting history reflects the partisan positions of its members. Since 1937, at least five justices have been elected to the Court, replacing the retiring members. Since the U.S. census was revised in 1890 and again in 1920, the numbers and composition of the Court has changed radically, even within a single generation. In the ten years from 1884 to 1894, only two justices were elected. From 1898 until 1938, ten justices were elected, including FDR's "court packing" appointments in 1937 to expand the size of the Court from nine to 15. The addition of five more justices occurred in 1971 with the appointments of six liberal justices, including Thurgood Marshall. In 1975, the addition of Reagan-appointed retired justice
